Confessions of a Full-Time Telecommuter

- The computer and Internet revolutions have made it possible for many employees to work at home. This way of working, known as "telecommuting," has boomed in recent years. But telecommuting has both advantages and disadvantages. In this article, journalist Barbara Gomolski discusses the pros and cons of working at home.*
- Thirteen years ago, I embarked on a personal and professional adventure when I accepted a job in the Boston area while living in California, with the intention of telecommuting full time. The forward-thinking company that hired me (which happens to publish Computerworld) recognized that it could hire the best people if it cast its hiring net nationally. Now, of course, telecommuting is a norm and a perk that many IT professionals have come to expect. Still, it's not a given in all companies.
- Based on more than a decade of experience, here are my observations and suggestions about telecommuting, some of which may surprise you:
 - For self-motivated employees, telecommuting means a productivity boost. Focused and dedicated individuals will get far more work done at home than in an office.
 - Telecommuting improves job satisfaction and loyalty for employees who want to do it and are well suited to the arrangement.
 - Some employees will prefer to come to the office because home is not conducive to work. The key is to have the flexibility to support the differing work styles of various employees.
 - Organizations that fail to allow flexible work arrangements will find it increasingly difficult to attract the best candidates.
 - In some organizations, telecommuters face limited promotion opportunities because "managers" must work in an office. If you are building a virtual organization, the same opportunities should be open to everyone. It's harmful to the company if telecommuters are relegated to certain jobs by virtue of where they work.
 - It's impossible to "check up" on telecommuters, and you shouldn't even try. If you don't trust people and you don't feel confident that you can measure their performance, don't allow telecommuting. Don't call telecommuters at 8 a.m. or 5 p.m. to see if they are in the office. Respect that people have different work styles. Some may like to get into the office a few hours early but take a two-hour lunch. As long as they are available when they need to be, be satisfied. Focus on outcomes, not work styles.
 - New employees who telecommute should be assigned mentors to help them navigate issues that are unique to telecommuters, such as connecting from home.
 - Companies are saving a bunch of money on office space as a result of telecommuting. As working from home becomes more widespread, employees will expect to be compensated for the costs of owning their home offices.

Make you Own DBQ!!

Turned in (4) Due May 3, 2014

You will work in groups of 3 to design your own Document Based Question (DBQ). I have attached a couple of samples to assist you in this task. Your DBQ must be based on events from Chapters 27 or 28. You must include the following:

- A complex question that require the test taker to expand their thinking and synthesize both the documents and their own prior knowledge
- A minimum of 7 documents, cited and annotated (provide definition of any necessary vocabulary words)
- A list of people, places, and events that the reader will be looking for when correcting the DBQ (minimum of 20) Show Less

War and diplomacy

-Philosophers called war a foolish waste of life and resources in stupid quarrels of no value to humankind

-18 century European system of self-governing and individual states were largely in the principle of self-interest

-Balance of power: counterbalance the power of one states by another to prevent any one state from domination the others

-The balance of power did not imply a desire of peace large armies created to defend a state's security were used for offensive purpose as well

A Revived Papacy

- The involvement of the renaissance papacy in dubious finances and Italian political and military affairs had given ride to numerous sources of corruption
- Taking a jolt from the Protestant reformation the papacy had its own reformation
- Pope Paul III perceived the need for change and expressed it decisively
- Paul took the audacious step of appointing a reform commission to study the condition of the church. The commission's report in 1537 blames the church's problems on the corrupt policies of popes and cardinals
- A colloquy had been held at the regensburg in a final attempt to settle the religious division peacefully was the turning point in the direction of the Catholic reformation and the nature of papal reformation
- When pope Paul IV Was chosen to be pope in 1555 he increased the power f the inquisition that even liberal cardinals were silenced

The Council of Trent

- Pope Paul III took the decisive step of calling for a general council of Christendom to resolve the religious difference created by the Protestant revolt
- The council met intermittently in three major sessions:
- Formulating doctrinal definitions that would encourage Protestants to return to the church
- Restatement of the catholic doctrines in strict opposition to Protestant position
- The final doctrinal decrees of the council of trent reaffirmed traditional catholic teaching in opposition to Protestant beliefs
- Of the reform decrees that were passed the most important established theological seminaries in every diocese for the training of priests
- After the council of Trent the RCC possessed a clear body of doctrine and unified church under the acknowledge supremacy of the popes, who had triumphed over bishops and councils
